Gentlemen.

Why is it that we have to have de-salinization plants in Northern California? Wouldn't the de-salinization plants be better placed in Southern California where Southern California can get all the water it wants right at its shores rather than have California spend the money for de-salinization plants AND then dig the tunnels AND then transport canal AND then the cost of transport. The cost I believe would be considerably less.

Additionally, I can't believe that the attack on The Delta, one of our country's treasured and historical regions is being subject to these risks. The thought of adversely affecting the Delta is in violation of the existing EPA regulations and will endanger the Pacific Coast Fly Way and all of the birds protected by the Migratory Bird Treaty Act. The violation of the above I am sure is the short list of what the California State Legislature will be doing.
